GREAT FALLS, Mont. — Cascade County commissioners say they plan to continue studying the idea of imposing fees on small wind farm developments despite arguments against such a plan by a wind energy developer.

The Great Falls Tribune reports that commissioners met Friday to discuss what other counties do when charging developers for impacts of the projects.

Chairman Bill Salina is concerned about possible aesthetic impacts of wind farms.

State law allows local governments to charge an impact fee for the first three years of operation.

The county recently approved a 24-megawatt win farm on 3,000 acres south of Belt. The wind farm will have 16 turbines that are 400 feet tall.
