FERNDALE - The city is considering an ordinance that would make transportation impact fees more predictable, but potentially more expensive, for builders.

Ferndale City Council will have a study session and public hearing on the fee revision Monday, March 21.

The proposed ordinance would create a fee of either $2,685 or $3,851 that a developer would pay for each car trip that the project would generate during peak evening rush hour.

Current transportation impact fees vary dramatically depending on a project's proposed use and location in the city, according to council documents. Staff has estimated that the existing cost-per-trip can range from $350 to $3,750.

The impact fee helps pay a developer's share for transportation projects that the city has planned for the next 24 years.

If the Interstate 5 overpass connecting Thornton Road to Portal Way is included in those projects, the fee would be $3,851. Staff has said the overpass project requires more engineering study and more funding strategies before being included, so without it the fee would be $2,685 per trip.

In Bellingham, the transportation impact fee is $1,927 per evening rush hour trip that a project is expected to generate.
